The architects of the Brooklyn-based company Snarkitecture are obsessed with excavation. Instead of building something up, as most architects do, they like to carve things out. Even when these things are completely two-dimensional. For the 2017 edition of Salone del Mobile, the annual design exhibition and festival in Milan, Snarkitecture created topographies, a wallpaper with a pattern of torn paper. Look at the pattern from afar, and it looks like it's coming out of the wall. [Photo: Lauren Coleman] Once finished, the stack looked like a topographical map. They photographed details from the edges and printed it on the wallpaper. When installed, it creates a three-dimensional optical illusion that gives a flat surface depth. Referring to the aging process of layered wallpaper, the design reveals an unexpected link between destruction and construction, the company said in a statement. It's just the company's latest attempt to play with positive and negative space. For fashion designer Richard Chai, Snarkitecture's designers made a cavernous pop-up shaving with a hot wire cutter. He further riffed on the idea for The Miami Design by building a cave with inflatables on his entrance pavilion. For a showcase for art and installation architecture, the company used options, hammers, and chisels to create a real Arctic slit of foam eps. Snarkitecture even made a chocolate-like tectonic plates intersect. Take a list-fore kinal-designed for Brooklyn-based wall covering company Calico-in the slide show above. One of the perks of having an Android phone is that it's easy to customize. Each phone may look the same on the outside, but it may differ on the inside. Advanced users usually customize their phones by changing the ROM's features, improving its performance, and removing bloatware applications installed on the phone. Instead, beginners tend to customize their phones by downloading tons of third-party apps from the Google Play Store. You can download and install keyboards, launchers, widgets, and beautiful live wallpapers.
